To create a space to unwind and refresh, the dual-career clients for this bathroom remodel sought clean lines, a spa-like atmosphere, and a blue-and-brown color scheme. They didn't need a separate water closet, but the couple liked the idea of making the toilet semi-private. Leslie Lamarre, CKD, principal of TRG Architects, found the perfect solution: a resin partition. "I used the panel as a bit of a privacy screen for the toilet," she says.

Unlike frosted glass, the panel is lightweight and easy to handle. A leaf pattern imbedded in the middle adds visual interest. Lamarre specified a simple cable-supported system that attaches to the ceiling and the countertop. She says the panel provides privacy and separation between the toilet and vanity but also lends the space a warm, organic feel. —Nigel F. Maynard
